Questions 6 - 10

It's important to _____ (6) _____ between types of citizen journalism, as they have not enjoyed equal success. Photo and video journalism stand out in this regard. This is in part because the _____ (7) _____ of recording devices has far outstripped mainstream media's ability to gather visual content, to the point where news teams now search social media sites for footage. Some organizations now "crowdsource" news images and employ platforms for the public to upload digital content directly. These include CNN's iReport, which as of 2015 had 1.3 million _____ (8) _____—up 600 percent since its 2008 launch. Other news organizations have been following suit, with some commentators noting failure to do so often directs Web traffic to user-content sites like YouTube and LiveLeak. With news organizations relying more and more on Web advertising for revenue, none can afford to ignore traffic trends. The Arab Spring and conflicts in Syria and Iraq are good examples of issues that could not possibly have been covered as effectively with traditional methods—in terms of visual evidence, anyway. It's still _____ (9) _____ upon reputable news organizations to monitor the sea of information and check for _____ (10) _____. But by and large, mainstream media has accepted the importance of the phone camera as fact.
